The latest instant water heaters boast sleek designs without compromising on convenience and efficiency

Even though we live in a tropical place like Singapore, there's no denying that we often enjoy the comfort of a warm shower. Having heated water is a modern convenience that allows us to start and end the day on the right note.

When it comes to choosing the ideal water heater for your bathrooms, the question of which kind is best will come up. There are typically two types of heaters available in Singapore – storage and instant. The former is able to hold a large volume of heated water in a tank or reservoir that is then used throughout the entire home. When it is switched on, cold water inside the tank is heated and stored. This type of water heater gets its energy source from various methods, including electricity, solar power and heat pumps.

An instant water heater, on the other hand, heats water on demand. This simply means that when you switch on the heater, it will rapidly warm up the water that flows through the unit. In homes with small bathrooms, instant water heaters are popular because the device takes up less space. In addition, instant water heaters only use energy when in use, making it energy efficient and cost effective.

While older instant water heaters are bulky and may boast straightforward designs, newer models sporting sleek silhouettes and design-forward aesthetics are coming forth. One such example is the GOGO 933 series of water heaters from Rubine. Available in both black and white, and at just 87mm thick, the slim instant water heater is versatile enough to blend into any bathroom decor. Other than its elegant design, the GOGO water heater is engineered using UK Technology Heating Element and features a built-in auto flow sensor, making it durable. It also comes with a slim three-spray hand shower that allows you to choose from Massage, Rain and Rain + Massage modes to let you create your perfect shower experience.

With its sophisticated design and usability, the GOGO 933 series of water heaters are ideal for you if you are looking for a convenient yet effective way to enjoy your daily shower.
